

arguments of the plaintiffs in IRAP and Hawaii. Notably, the Supreme Court's stay orders were issued after the events described by Plaintiffs as justifying relief here. See ECF No. 131 at 3 ¶ 7.

2. Although the Supreme Court's stay orders do not directly address the refugee-related policies, the legal determinations underpinning those orders also foreclose relief as to those policies. In deciding whether to stay an injunction, the Supreme Court considers the same factors governing issuance of a preliminary injunction. See Nken v. Holder, 556 U.S. 418, 434 (2009). Accordingly, when the Supreme Court granted the Government's stay applications in IRAP and Hawaii, the Court necessarily determined that the Government had demonstrated a likelihood of success on the merits and that the Government's national-security and foreign-policy interests outweighed the plaintiffs' interests.

Here, many of the legal claims and equitable interests that Plaintiffs rely on in their challenges to the refugee policies are the same as those at issue in IRAP and Hawaii. If anything, Plaintiffs' arguments are even weaker here. For example, with respect to Plaintiffs' Establishment Clause claim against the Joint Memorandum, Plaintiffs have not even attempted to allege any animus associated with the relevant decisionmakers for that policy—i.e., the Secretaries of State and Homeland Security and the Director of National Intelligence. In terms of the equitable balance, moreover, the Government's national-security interests relating to the entry of refugees are equally weighty as the concerns regarding the entry of other foreign travelers. Yet the Plaintiffs' interests here are significantly weaker: they rely on the same interest in having their family members admitted to the country, see ECF No. 131 at 2-3, but critically the challenged SAO policy is only a temporary, 90-day measure, and approximately half of that time period has already passed. The Supreme Court's determination that the Government's interests predominate over the IRAP and Hawaii plaintiffs' interests, at least for the length of time necessary for resolution of the issues by the Courts of Appeals and the Supreme Court, likewise means that the Government's interests in the refugee policies predominate over Plaintiffs' interests for the next 45 days.

In short, the Supreme Court's stay orders foreclose relief as to the refugee policies, because on all of the relevant factors the Government is in the same (or stronger) position as in the challenges at issue in IRAP and Hawaii. Accordingly, this Court should deny Plaintiffs' requested injunctions, or at a minimum stay consideration of those motions and these proceedings pending completion of the Court of Appeals and Supreme Court proceedings in IRAP and Hawaii.
